Dedication

To every child who feels a little scared sometimes, and to every small heart that chooses to try anyway.

To the children who take deep breaths, who stand up, speak up, and keep going,
even when things feel big and difficult.

And to the grown-ups who guide them,
hold their hands, and remind them that bravery lives inside them every day.

Anote To Parents and Teachers

Dear Parents and Teachers,

This book is written to help children understand what bravery really means. Many children think being brave means not feeling scared at all, but that is not true. Bravery means feeling scared, nervous, or unsure, and still trying anyway. It is about taking small steps, facing little fears, and learning that they are stronger than they think. This book gently shows children that courage grows every time they try, even if they do not succeed the first time.

At this age, children often face new experiences that can feel big to them. Speaking in class, making new friends, trying a new activity, or even sleeping alone can feel scary. These moments are very important because they are chances for children to practice bravery. Your role is to support them, encourage them, and remind them that it is okay to feel afraid. When children feel safe and understood, they are more willing to try again and grow their confidence.

As you read this book together, take time to pause and talk about the story. Ask simple questions like, "What made the character feel scared?" or "What helped them be brave?" You can also connect the story to the child's own life by asking,

“When did you feel brave?” or “What can you try even if it feels a little scary?” These small conversations help children understand their feelings and learn how to handle them.

It is also important to celebrate effort, not just success. When a child tries something new, even if they struggle, praise their courage. Say things like, “I am proud of you for trying,” or “That was very brave.” This helps children see that bravery is not about being perfect—it is about trying, learning, and growing. Over time, they begin to believe in themselves and feel more confident in facing challenges.

The activities and reflection moments in this book are designed to help children practice bravery in real life. Drawing, talking, and trying small challenges help them build courage step by step. With your guidance and encouragement, children will learn that bravery is something they can use every day, in small and big ways.

Thank you for supporting children as they grow into confident, brave, and strong individuals. With your help, they will learn that even when they feel scared, they can take a deep breath, try again, and discover the courage that has always been inside them.

Part I: Understanding Bravery

Chapter 1: What Is Bravery?

Bravery is something very special that lives inside you. You cannot see it like a toy, and you cannot touch it like a ball, but you can feel it in your heart. Bravery is what helps you try new things, speak up, and keep going even when something feels scary or difficult. Many people think that being brave means not feeling afraid at all, but that is not true. Everyone feels afraid sometimes. Being brave means feeling afraid and choosing to try anyway.

Sometimes you might feel nervous when you are about to do something new. Maybe you are trying to answer a question in class, talk to a new friend, or climb something a little high. Your tummy might feel funny, your hands might feel a bit shaky, and your heart might beat fast. That feeling does not mean something is wrong. It means your bravery is getting ready to grow. When you take a deep breath and try, even a little bit, you are using your courage, and your strength becomes bigger inside you.

Bravery is not always loud or big. Sometimes it is quiet and gentle. It can be as simple as trying again after making a mistake, asking for help when you do not understand something, or telling the truth even when it feels hard. These small moments are very important because they show that your heart is strong. Every time you make a brave choice, even a tiny one, you are teaching yourself that you can face challenges and keep moving forward.

Everyone has bravery inside them, including you. Some people use it often, and others are still learning how to use it, but it is always there. The more you practice being brave, the easier it becomes. Your mind learns to stay calm, your heart learns to be strong, and you begin to believe in yourself more and more. Step by step, your bravery grows, and you start to see that you can do things that once felt impossible.

Think about it: Can you remember a time when you felt scared but tried anyway? How did it feel after you tried?

Try this: Today, think of one small thing that feels a little scary. Take a deep breath and say, "I can try." Then take one small step. Notice how you feel afterward. That feeling is your bravery growing inside you.

Chapter 2: Everyone Feels Scared Sometimes

Everyone feels scared sometimes, even very brave people. Feeling scared is a normal part of being human. It can happen when you are trying something new, going somewhere unfamiliar, or doing something that feels a little big for you. You might feel it when you are about to speak in front of others, meet new friends, or try something you have never done before. These feelings are not a sign of weakness—they are a sign that you are growing and stepping into something new.

When you feel scared, your body may react in different ways. Your heart might beat faster, your hands might feel a little shaky, or your tummy might feel like butterflies are fluttering inside. These feelings can seem uncomfortable, but they are actually your body getting ready to help you. It is like your body is saying, “This is important. Get ready!” Understanding this can help you feel calmer, because you know that nothing is wrong—your body is just preparing you to be brave.

Even the strongest and bravest people you know feel scared sometimes. A teacher speaking in front of a class, a parent trying something new, or a friend learning a new skill may all feel nervous inside. The difference is that they choose to take a step forward anyway. They take a deep breath, focus, and try. This is what makes them brave—not the absence of fear, but the decision to move forward despite it.

You can learn to do the same. When you feel scared, you can pause, take a deep breath, and remind yourself, “It’s okay to feel this way. I can still try.” You do not have to do everything at once. You can take one small step, then another. Each step you take helps your fear feel smaller and your courage feel bigger. Over time, you will notice that things that once felt very scary start to feel easier, because you have practiced being brave.

Think about it: What is something that sometimes makes you feel scared? How does your body feel when that happens?

Try this: The next time you feel scared, stop for a moment and take a slow, deep breath. Place your hand on your chest and say, “I am okay. I can try.” Then take one small step forward. Notice how your courage begins to grow.

Chapter 3: Small Steps Are Big Bravery

Bravery does not always mean doing something huge or loud. Sometimes, the bravest thing you can do is take a very small step, even when you feel nervous. Every small step is a way to show your courage, and over time, these little steps add up to very big bravery. For example, raising your hand in class, trying a new food, or helping a friend who fell down may seem small, but they are all acts of courage. Each one teaches your heart and mind that you can face challenges, bit by bit.

When you take small steps, you give yourself a chance to grow slowly and safely. Imagine climbing a staircase. You do not jump to the top in one leap—you take one step, then another, until you reach the top. Each step may feel a little scary at first, but as you continue, your confidence grows. The same is true for bravery. Each tiny action that feels a little scary makes your courage stronger and your heart braver.

Sometimes, small steps can feel harder than big ones because your brain notices every little feeling of fear. It may say, “Don’t do it. This is too hard.” But this is the moment your bravery is needed most. You can pause, take a deep breath, and say to yourself, “I can do one small thing first. I will try.” This choice to act, even a little, shows that your courage is growing. It is proof that you are learning to be brave, step by step.

Here is a story: Amani wanted to sing in front of her class. She felt nervous and thought, “What if I forget the words?” Instead of saying no, she decided to start with one small step—she stood up, smiled, and sang the first line. Her hands were shaking, but she kept going. By the end, she had sung the whole song! She learned that even tiny steps can lead to big bravery.

Think about it: What is one small thing you can try today that feels a little scary? How would taking that step make your heart stronger?

Try this: Pick one tiny brave step this week. It could be saying hello to someone new, asking a question in class, or helping a friend. Take a deep breath and do it. Notice how your heart feels afterward. Each small step you take is proof that bravery lives inside you.

Chapter 4: Bravery Helps Us Learn

Bravery is not only about facing fears—it also helps us learn new things. Every time we try something even when it feels a little scary, we give ourselves a chance to discover, explore, and grow. Learning can feel tricky at first, especially when we make mistakes. But mistakes are part of learning, and being brave helps us keep trying. When we act despite being nervous, our minds and hearts grow stronger, and we discover we can do more than we thought.

Sometimes, learning new skills makes us feel unsure. You might feel worried about drawing a picture, counting numbers, or reading a new word. That feeling is normal. Bravery helps you take the first step anyway. Even if you make mistakes, you are still learning, and each mistake teaches something new. When you are brave, mistakes stop being scary—they become chances to get better and grow stronger.

Here is a story: Lino wanted to learn to ride his bicycle without training wheels. The first time he tried, he fell down and scraped his knee. His brain whispered, “You can’t do it.” But Lino remembered that being brave means trying even when it feels hard. He took a deep breath, stood up, and tried again. This time, he pedaled a little farther. After several tries, he rode all the way across the yard! Lino learned that bravery helps us keep learning, even when it is difficult.

Bravery also helps us ask questions and explore new ideas. Sometimes, children feel nervous about asking a question in class because they are afraid of being wrong. But asking questions is a brave way to learn. Every question you ask helps your brain grow and helps you understand the world better. Courage and curiosity work together—being brave lets us learn more and discover new things every day.

Think about it: What is something new you would like to try, even if it feels scary? How could being brave help you learn it?

Try this: Today, do one small brave thing to help yourself learn. Ask a question, try a new game, or practice a skill you are not perfect at yet. Notice how your courage grows and how your mistakes help you learn something new.

Chapter 5: Bravery in Helping Others

Bravery is not only about being brave for yourself—it is also about being brave to help others. Sometimes, helping a friend or a classmate can feel a little scary. Maybe you are afraid they will say no, or maybe you worry about making a mistake. Even when it feels a little uncomfortable, choosing to help is a very brave thing to do. Helping others shows that your heart is strong and that your courage is growing.

When you help someone, you are practicing kindness and bravery at the same time. It can be something small, like picking up a toy that fell, sharing your pencil, or comforting a friend who feels sad. Even though these actions may seem simple, they are powerful because they take courage. Sometimes being brave for someone else is harder than being brave for yourself, because you care about them and want to do it the right way. But even small acts make a big difference.

Here is a story: Sifa saw her friend fall while playing. She felt nervous and thought, “What if I fall too?” But she also knew her friend needed help. Sifa took a deep breath, ran over, and helped her friend stand up. Her friend smiled, and Sifa felt proud and brave inside. She realized that helping others makes her heart feel bigger and her courage grow even more.

Bravery in helping others also teaches us to speak up when something is wrong. If someone is being treated unfairly or feels left out, it takes courage to say, “That is not okay,” or “Let’s include them.” These brave words can make a big difference, and over time, children learn that their bravery can make the world around them better.

Think about it: Who might need your help today? What small brave thing can you do for them?

Try this: Today, notice one small way you can help someone. It could be a friend, a classmate, or even a family member. Take a deep breath and do it. When you help others, your bravery grows bigger, and your heart grows stronger.

Part II: Bravery at Home

Chapter 6: Being Brave in Your Family

Being brave at home means trying new things, speaking up, and helping out, even when it feels a little scary. Your home is a place where you can practice bravery safely. Sometimes it is easy to be brave outside with friends or at school, but being brave at home can be just as important. You might try a new chore, say how you feel, or admit a mistake. Each of these small acts is a way to show courage and grow your heart.

Families are special because they love you and support you, even when you are nervous. Being brave at home could mean asking for help when you don't understand something or saying sorry when you make a mistake. These actions may feel hard, but they show that your heart is strong. Your family notices and celebrates every time you try, even if things don't go perfectly. This helps you learn that courage is about effort and learning, not being perfect.

Here is a story: Tendo wanted to tell his parents that he had broken a cup by accident. At first, he felt worried and thought, "They might be angry." But he took a deep breath and said, "I am sorry. I broke the cup." His parents smiled and said, "Thank you for telling the truth. That was brave of you." Tendo felt proud because he had been honest, even though it felt scary. Being brave at home helped him grow trust, confidence, and courage.

Bravery at home also includes trying new activities or helping with tasks you have never done before. Pouring juice carefully, helping clean up, or learning to set the table may seem small, but each action teaches responsibility, patience, and courage. Every time you take a step, your heart feels stronger, and you begin to see that bravery is something you can use every day, not just outside your home.

Think about it: What is one small brave thing you can do at home today? How would it help you feel stronger?

Try this: Choose one action this week to show bravery at home. Ask for help if you need it, say how you feel, or try a new chore. Notice how it makes you feel inside. Each brave step at home is practice for being brave anywhere.

Chapter 7: Learning to Ask for Help

Being brave does not mean doing everything alone. Sometimes, the bravest thing you can do is ask for help when you need it. Asking for help can feel a little scary because you might worry about bothering someone or looking weak. But asking for help shows courage, because it means you are taking responsibility for learning, solving a problem, or keeping someone safe. It is a strong choice, not a weak one.

At home, asking for help can be simple, like asking a parent to tie your shoelaces, help carry something heavy, or explain a task you don't understand. At school, it might mean asking your teacher to show you a new way to write a word, count numbers, or play a game. Asking for help is part of learning and growing. When you ask, you give yourself a chance to understand better, gain confidence, and try again without fear.

Here is a story: Malaika was trying to build a tall block tower. Each time she added a new block, the tower wobbled and fell. She felt frustrated and almost gave up. Then she remembered that asking for help is brave. She asked her older brother to show her a trick to balance the blocks. With his help, she built a taller tower than ever before! Malaika learned that asking for help does not mean you are weak—it means you are smart and brave.

Asking for help also teaches patience and teamwork. When someone helps you, you practice listening and learning. You also show respect for their knowledge and care. Over time, children who ask for help learn that courage comes in many forms—sometimes it is doing something on your own, and sometimes it is reaching out for support. Both ways grow your heart and mind.

Think about it: What is one thing you can ask for help with today? Who could you ask, and how would it make your task easier or more fun?

Try this: Choose one thing that feels a little hard today. Take a deep breath and ask someone you trust for help. Notice how your heart feels afterward. Asking for help is a brave choice that makes you stronger every day.

Chapter 8: Bravery at School

School is a place full of chances to be brave. Every day, children face new challenges—raising their hands to answer a question, speaking in front of the class, trying a new game, or making new friends. These moments can feel a little scary, but they are perfect opportunities to practice courage. Being brave at school helps your heart grow stronger, your mind become more confident, and your friendships flourish.

Sometimes, being brave at school means trying even when you are unsure. You might not know the answer to a question, or you might feel nervous about reading aloud. That is okay! Courage is about taking a deep breath and trying anyway. Your teacher and classmates will notice your effort, and you will notice that each time you try, your confidence grows. Even if you make a mistake, your bravery shines through because you faced your fear instead of giving up.

Here is a story: Kato was asked to read a story aloud in front of his classmates. His hands were shaking, and his tummy felt funny. He thought, “What if I make a mistake?” But Kato remembered that being brave means trying even when you feel scared. He took a deep breath, started reading slowly, and even if he stumbled on a few words, he kept going. By the end, his classmates clapped, and Kato felt proud. His courage helped him learn that trying is more important than being perfect.

Bravery at school also includes helping others. Standing up for a friend who feels left out, inviting someone new to play, or helping someone with a task takes courage. These acts of bravery make your school a happier, safer, and kinder place. Each time you show bravery at school, you practice facing fears, learning from mistakes, and growing stronger.

Think about it: What is one brave thing you could try at school today? How would it help you feel stronger or help someone else?

Try this: Pick one small act of courage at school this week. It could be answering a question, playing with someone new, or helping a friend. Take a deep breath, do it, and notice how brave you feel afterward. Each step you take builds your lion heart bigger and stronger every day.

Part III: Bravery in the World

Chapter 9: Bravery Outside Home and School

Bravery does not stop at home or at school. You can be brave in the world around you too—at the park, at the market, at a friend's house, or even on a trip to a new place. The world is full of new sights, sounds, and people, and these new experiences can feel exciting but also a little scary. Bravery helps you explore safely, try new things, and face challenges while keeping your heart strong and your mind confident.

Being brave in the world often means trying things you have never done before. It could be climbing a new jungle gym, joining a game with children you do not know, or speaking to a grown-up when you need help. These small acts may feel scary at first, but each time you try, you learn that your courage is bigger than you thought. Bravery outside home and school helps you discover what you can do and teaches you to trust yourself.

Here is a story: Ayo went to a new playground with slides he had never tried. At first, he felt nervous and thought, “What if I fall?” He took a deep breath and decided to try the smallest slide first. Step by step, he climbed higher, feeling his heart beat fast with nervous excitement. By the end of the day, Ayo had slid down every slide at the playground! He learned that bravery is about taking small steps, trying again, and celebrating each success, no matter how small.

Bravery in the world also means being kind and helpful to others. You might see someone who is lost, scared, or needs a friend. Stepping forward to help, even in a small way, takes courage and makes the world a better place. Your actions, no matter how small, can give someone else confidence and joy. This shows that bravery is not just about you—it is about making the world around you brighter and safer.

Think about it: What is one place outside your home or school where you could be brave? What small step could you take there today?

Try this: Today, find one small way to show courage outside your home or school. It could be trying something new, helping someone, or asking a question when you are unsure. Take a deep breath, try it, and notice how your courage grows. Every brave action, big or small, helps your lion heart grow stronger.

Chapter 10: Bravery Helps You Learn From Mistakes

Being brave also means learning from your mistakes. Everyone makes mistakes—sometimes we spill juice, forget a word, or fall while running. Mistakes are a natural part of life, and they do not mean you are bad or not smart. Bravery is noticing the mistake, taking a deep breath, and choosing to try again. Each mistake is a chance to learn, grow, and become stronger inside.

Mistakes can feel frustrating or even a little embarrassing. Your brain might say, “You failed!” or “You can’t do this!” But being brave means listening to a better thought instead: “I can try again” or “I am learning.” When you choose this brave thought, you give your heart and mind the chance to grow. Every time you try after a mistake, you build courage, confidence, and strength that will help you in other challenges too.

Here is a story: Dalia was learning to write her name neatly. The first few tries were messy, and she felt frustrated. Her brain whispered, “You’ll never get it right.” But Dalia remembered she was brave. She said, “I can try again. I am learning.” She practiced slowly, and each time her writing improved. By the end of the week, Dalia could write her name beautifully! She learned that mistakes are not the end—they are the start of learning.

Being brave with mistakes also teaches patience and kindness to yourself. Sometimes you might make the same mistake more than once. That is okay! Bravery is about not giving up, even when things feel tricky. Every small attempt, every little step, shows that your courage is growing. The more you practice, the more you discover that mistakes are stepping stones to learning new skills, solving problems, and becoming the best version of yourself.

Think about it: Can you remember a time when a mistake helped you learn something new? How did you feel afterward?

Try this: Today, notice one small mistake you make. Take a deep breath, say, "I can try again," and try once more. Celebrate each brave attempt, because each one helps your heart grow stronger and your courage grow bigger.

Part IV: Bravery in Your Heart

Chapter 11: Your Courage Grows Every Day

Courage is not something you have only sometimes—it grows a little every day. Every time you try something new, face a fear, or help someone, your bravery grows stronger. You may not notice it at first, because courage often grows quietly inside your heart. But over time, all your small brave actions add up, and you begin to see just how strong and capable you really are.

Bravery grows when you practice. Each time you try, even when things feel tricky, your brain and heart learn that you can handle challenges. Trying something new might feel scary, like learning to ride a bike, speaking in front of a group, or joining a new game. But each step, each little attempt, builds confidence and courage. Even if you make mistakes, your bravery grows, because every effort teaches you something important.

Here is a story: Omar wanted to swim across the small pool. At first, he felt nervous and worried he might sink. But he practiced every day, starting with the shallow end, then holding onto the edge, and finally letting go for a short distance. Every small attempt made him braver. By the end of the week, he could swim confidently across! Omar discovered that courage grows when you take it one step at a time, day by day.

Bravery also grows when you believe in yourself, even when your thoughts say you cannot do something. Sometimes your brain will tell you, “This is too hard,” or “I might fail.” These thoughts are normal, but your heart can choose a braver thought instead: “I can try,” “I am learning,” or “I can do my best.” Choosing these thoughts helps your courage grow quietly, steadily, and powerfully.

Think about it: What is one thing you have tried lately that felt scary at first? How did your courage grow as you practiced or tried again?

Try this: Today, do one brave thing, even if it feels small. Take a deep breath, remind yourself that courage grows with practice, and try. Notice how your heart feels afterward. Each brave action adds a little more strength to your lion heart, helping you grow stronger every single day.

Chapter 12: Bravery Makes You Stronger

Bravery does more than help you try new things—it makes you stronger inside. Every time you face a fear, try something new, or speak up when it feels scary, your heart and mind grow stronger. Courage builds like a muscle: the more you use it, the more powerful it becomes. Small acts of bravery add up over time, helping you feel confident, capable, and ready for challenges that come your way.

Being brave can feel hard sometimes, especially when your brain worries about mistakes or being laughed at. But each time you take a deep breath and act anyway, you are strengthening your inner courage. Strength from bravery is not about never feeling scared—it is about choosing to act even when you feel nervous or unsure. This is what makes your heart and mind resilient.

Here is a story: Amani was learning to climb the big rope at the playground. At first, she hesitated, thinking, “What if I fall?” She felt nervous, but she took a deep breath, held the rope tightly, and climbed a little at a time. With each step, her heart felt braver. By the end, she reached the top and felt proud and strong. Amani realized that bravery makes you stronger, even when it starts with small steps.

Bravery also helps you recover from mistakes and keep going. When you fall, drop something, or forget a word, your courage helps you stand up, try again, and keep learning. Each attempt makes your inner strength grow. Over time, children who practice bravery discover that nothing is too big to try, because their hearts are strong, their minds are ready, and their courage is growing every day.

Think about it: When was a time you were brave, even just a little? How did it make you feel stronger?

Try this: Today, do one thing that feels a little scary or new. Take a deep breath, try it, and notice how your heart and courage grow. Remember: every small brave step you take makes you stronger, smarter, and more ready for tomorrow.

Part V: Growing Your Bravery Every Day

Chapter 13: Your Bravery Superpower

Bravery is like a superpower that you carry inside your heart. You may not see it, but it is always there, ready to help you face fears, try new things, and help others. This superpower grows every time you act with courage, even in small ways. The more you practice, the stronger it becomes, and the more you discover that you can do things you never thought possible.

Your bravery superpower helps you in many ways. It helps you learn new skills, speak up when you have an idea, and keep trying even when something feels tricky. It helps you make friends, solve problems, and take care of yourself and others. Every time you choose a brave thought, take a brave action, or try again after a mistake, your superpower grows a little more.

Here is a story: Nia was nervous about performing a song in front of her class. She felt butterflies in her tummy and thought, “What if I forget the words?” But Nia remembered that her bravery superpower was with her. She took a deep breath, smiled, and sang as best as she could. Her classmates clapped, and Nia felt proud and strong inside. She realized that her bravery superpower helped her shine, even when she felt scared at first.

Bravery also helps you keep growing every day. Sometimes, you will make mistakes, feel nervous, or face something new. That is normal! Your bravery superpower helps you take a deep breath, try again, and keep learning. Each time you do this, you build confidence, courage, and strength that will stay with you forever. The more you practice, the more your heart grows, and the more your superpower shines.

Think about it: What is one brave thing you can do today to use your superpower? How would it help you feel stronger inside?

Try this: Today, choose one small act of courage—try a new activity, ask for help, speak up, or help someone else. Notice how it makes your heart feel bigger and your bravery grow. Every time you use your superpower, you discover that you are stronger than you think.

Chapter 14: Bravery Helps You Help Others

Bravery is not only for yourself—it can also help you make the world better for others. When you are brave, you notice when someone needs help, and you take action even if it feels a little scary. Helping others shows that your heart is strong and that your courage is growing. Every act of kindness or support is a way to practice bravery and make a difference.

Helping someone might feel small, like picking up a toy, sharing a snack, or inviting someone to play. It might also feel bigger, like speaking up if someone is being left out, standing by a friend who is sad, or comforting someone who is hurt. Each time you act bravely, you teach yourself that courage is about doing the right thing, even when it is not easy.

Here is a story: Zuri saw a new student sitting alone at lunch. At first, she felt shy and worried about what her friends might think. But she remembered that bravery helps you help others. Zuri walked over, smiled, and invited the student to join her table. The new student felt happy and welcomed, and Zuri felt proud and strong inside. She realized that bravery is not only for facing fears—it is also for making a difference in someone else's day.

Bravery also teaches patience, empathy, and understanding. Sometimes helping others means listening carefully, giving time, or trying again if things don't go perfectly the first time. Every act of brave kindness helps your heart grow, your courage expand, and your friendships deepen. Over time, you discover that the more bravery you share, the stronger you become, and the happier the people around you feel.

Think about it: Who might need your help today? What small brave thing can you do for them?

Try this: Today, choose one act of courage to help someone. It could be a friend, a family member, or even a classmate you do not know well. Take a deep breath, act bravely, and notice how it makes your heart and theirs grow stronger. Remember: every act of brave kindness makes your lion heart bigger and stronger.

Chapter 15: Bravery and Mistakes Work Together

Bravery and mistakes are like best friends. Being brave does not mean you will never make a mistake—it means you face mistakes with courage, learn from them, and keep going. Every mistake is a chance to grow, and every act of bravery helps you turn mistakes into lessons. Together, bravery and mistakes help your heart grow stronger, your mind become smarter, and your confidence soar.

When you make a mistake, your brain might say, “Oh no! I failed!” or “I am not good enough.” But being brave means listening to a better thought: “I can try again” or “I am learning something new.” Choosing brave thoughts helps you stay calm, think clearly, and take the next step. Every time you do this, your courage grows, and mistakes become stepping stones instead of obstacles.

Here is a story: Lila was learning to draw a picture of a butterfly. Her first attempts were messy, and she felt frustrated. She almost crumpled the paper and gave up. Then she remembered that bravery and mistakes work together. She took a deep breath, smiled, and tried again. Each new attempt was a little better. By the end, Lila had a beautiful butterfly drawing! She realized that mistakes do not stop you—they help you learn and grow when you face them bravely.

Bravery also gives you the patience to keep going, even when things are hard. Sometimes you might make the same mistake more than once, or a task might feel too big. That is okay! Courage is about taking a deep breath, trying again, and believing that each effort counts. Over time, you will notice that mistakes are not scary—they are teachers, and your bravery helps you learn from them every single day.

Think about it: Can you remember a time when being brave helped you learn from a mistake? How did it make you feel?

Try this: Today, notice one mistake you make. Take a deep breath, choose a brave thought, and try again. Celebrate each small effort, because every brave step after a mistake makes your heart stronger, your courage bigger, and your skills better. Remember: bravery and mistakes are your partners in growing stronger every day.

Back Matter: You're Stronger Than You Think

Bravery Activity Pages

1. Draw Your Brave Moment

Think of a time you were brave. Maybe you tried a new game, spoke up to a friend, or helped someone even when it felt scary. On this page, draw a picture of yourself being brave. Add colors, smiles, and anything that shows how strong and proud you felt.

2. My Bravery Journal

Write or tell a story about one brave thing you did today. What made you nervous? What did you do anyway? How did it make you feel afterward? If you are not ready to write, draw your story and ask someone to help you label it with words.

3. Bravery Challenge

Try one small brave action each day this week. You could:

- Say hello to someone new
- Try a food you haven't eaten before
- Speak up when someone needs help
- Ask a question in class

Circle the day each time you complete your challenge and notice how your heart feels.

Reflection Prompts

Take a few moments to think, draw, or tell a grown-up about your answers:

- Can you remember a time you felt nervous but tried anyway?
- What makes your lion heart feel strong?
- Can mistakes help you be braver? How?
- Who helps you feel brave when things feel scary?

Reflection helps your courage grow bigger each day.

Bravery Promise

Repeat this promise every morning or whenever you feel a little scared:

"I am brave.

I try even when I feel scared.

I learn from my mistakes.

My lion heart grows stronger every day."

You can say it quietly in your mind, out loud to yourself, or with a friend or family member. Each time you say it, your bravery grows a little more.

For Grown-Ups: Helping Children Build Bravery

1. Encourage small steps – Let children try tasks on their own, even if mistakes happen. Celebrate effort, not just results.

2. Model bravery – Share your own “oops” moments and show how you try again. Children learn from seeing adults handle fear calmly.

3. Talk about feelings – Help children name feelings of fear, nervousness, or hesitation, and show them strategies to face them.

4. Praise courage, not perfection – Focus on the act of trying, helping, or speaking up rather than only the outcome.

By practicing these steps, adults help children grow confident, resilient, and brave—ready to face challenges in school, home, and life.
